Join us on the first Wednesday of each month at the Overlook, starting at 6:30 PM.

Thinking of a buffalograss lawn? Consider these three things first.

Installing low-water lawn alternatives is all the rage in Colorado right now, and one popular choice is buffalograss. This native Colorado species can make a good lawn substitute in some places, but it isn't without drawbacks—so consider carefully if it's the right fit for you.

1. Buffalograss isn't green a lot of the time. Buffalograss is a warm-season or C4 species (because of a molecule it uses in photosynthesis with 4 carbon atoms, not because of any explosive tendencies). Warm-season grasses are dormant for much of the year in Colorado—generally until night temperatures are reliably above 50 degrees. In the eastern half of the state, it will be green mid-May through September. Bluegrass, by comparison, is usually green March-November (or longer).
2. Buffalograss won't tolerate shade. Do you have a nice big tree in the yard? Then buffalograss probably isn't a good option; it needs full sun to grow best. A shaded buffalograss lawn will quickly become thin and patchy—a condition that is usually closely followed by extreme weediness. For shady spots, consider fine fescue (a cool-season species), another drought-tolerant lawn species that does well in shade, shade-tolerant ground covers, or even wood chip mulch.
3. Buffalograss doesn't care for traffic. Buffalograss can tolerate light recreation and foot traffic—you could even play croquet on a well-established buffalograss lawn. But if you have pets and/or children who will be using the lawn a lot, buffalograss will disappear (searching for greener pastures?). Fellow warm-season bermudagrass and cool season species Kentucky bluegrass and perennial ryegrass are more traffic-tolerant options.

If you start your buffalograss lawn from seed, the best-seeded cultivars are: Sundancer, Bison, Bowie, Cody, and Topgun. You can also plant buffalograss from plugs—Legacy and Prestige are the most cold-hardy for Colorado winters.

Whatever type of grass you choose for a lawn, remember that lawns don't waste water, people do. Make sure that your sprinkler system is in good repair, with no crooked or broken heads. Water should spray on the lawn, not on the sidewalk, the house, or other impervious surfaces. Match your water use to the season and only water when the grass needs it, not on the same schedule from May to October.

Brought to you by Colorado State University Extension and the Colorado Master Gardeners.
