Ready to Plant a Tree this Season?.

Planting a tree does not have to be painful. This task can be interesting and rewarding for many, many years to come. The Colorado State Forest Service recommends planting trees in the spring as this offers more moisture and cooler temperatures, which can be beneficial for the establishment of the tree. Fall planting is also a good option.

Prior to planting a tree, call the Utility Notification Center of Colorado at 8-1-1 or 1-800-922-1987 or go to <https://www.colorado811.org> before you dig, so that you or the contractor do not hit a utility line.

Front Range Tree Recommendation List - <https://extension.colostate.edu/docs/pubs/garden/treereclist.pdf>

Below are the steps to planting a tree:

Step 1: Determine the Depth of the Planting Hole

In tree planting, the root ball should sit on undug soil. This prevents the tree from sinking or tilting as the soil settles over time. The root ball should sit slightly above grade with no backfill soil added over the top of the root ball. This allows oxygen to get down into the root area. Measure the height of the root ball and subtract 1 or 2 inches to account for the root ball sitting slightly above grade.

Step 2: Dig a Saucer-shaped planting hole 3 times the root ball diameter

To support rapid root regeneration, research suggests a wide, saucer-shaped planting hole. If the roots have difficulty penetrating compacted site soil, sloped sides direct roots upward and outward toward the higher oxygen soil near the surface.

Step 3 Set tree in place, removing container

After gently removing the tree from the container, shave off the outer 1-1½ inch of the root ball. This can be done with a knife or saw during the planting process. This removes 'circling' roots. As you move the tree into place, limit using the trunk as a handle. The inside curve of the graft union should face north. Align the tree vertically and check from several angles. Add or subtract soil so that the top of the root ball will not be covered with soil. For stability, you may want to add a ring of soil around the base of the root ball. Remove all tree wrappings—many trees are killed long after planting by planting materials that are left on at planting.

Step 4 Backfill

During the backfill process, the best method is to simply return the soil that was removed during digging the hole and let water settle it. Backfill soil should not be placed on the top of the root ball. Amending the soil in the planting hole is a complex issue and has been researched extensively. In tree planting, it is a common procedure to amend backfill soil with organic matter, such as compost. Amending the backfill soil to be five percent organic matter by volume is acceptable and may be supportive to root growth in the planting hole during the first two years. However, amending the backfill to twenty-five to fifty percent organic matter may also hinder root spread beyond the planting hole, hold excessive amounts of water, and decompose, reducing the total volume of soil in the planting hole. For rapid root establishment and eliminating post-planting stress, the focus needs to be on creating a planting hole with the correct width and depth.

Step 5 Staking (if needed)

When trees are set on undisturbed soil and a ring of soil is firmed around the base before backfilling, staking is not needed in most landscape settings. However, in high wind areas and in areas where trees need protection from lawn equipment, staking may be necessary. Do not keep the tree staked for over a year, though, as this can weaken the stem structure. It's like wearing a cast on a leg that isn't broken.

Step 6 Watering the Soil

Watering is done after planting and staking so the gardener does not compact the wet soil by walking on the area.

This pinyon pine is on the way out, thanks to this twine that was left on at planting.

Step 7 Final Grade

In the wide, shallow planting hole, the backfill soil is likely to settle during watering. Final grading may be needed after watering.

Step 8 Adding Mulch

A circle of wood chip mulch will protect the trunk from lawnmower and string trimmer damage. On newly planted trees, organic mulch can increase fine root development by 400% and result in 20% faster canopy growth compared to grass under the tree. With newly planted trees, do not place mulch on top of the root ball in order to facilitate water getting to the newly planted roots. Once the tree is established, you can mulch up to (but not touching) the trunk.
